USSS

THE FAULT LINE

A Miles Long Short

Kamary Phillips

USSS: THE FAULT LINE

KAMARY PHILLIPS

Imprint
USSS: The Fault Line
A Miles-Long Short

Copyright © 2026 by Kamary Phillips
All rights reserved.

Published by Audible Publishers
An independent imprint specializing in original fiction, serialized storytelling, and cross-media narrative properties.
No part of this publication may be reproduced, distributed, or transmitted in any form or by any means—electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise—without the prior written permission of the publisher, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law.
This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, organizations, administrations, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, or to actual events or institutions is coincidental.
First edition
Printed in the United States of America

Audible Publishers
Original stories. Owned worlds.

For those who serve
even when the line moves.
And for the ones who know that loyalty without conscience is just another kind of silence.
And For those who stand the line–
and those who refuse to cross it.

Prologue 8
1 12
2 16
3 21
4 25
5 29
6 33
7 36
8 40
9 44
10 48
11 52
12 55
13 61
14 66
15 71
16 75
17 79
FINAL CHAPTER 84
About the Author 90

PROLOGUE

The Space She Should've Been Standing In

The cars are black. Too many of them. Lined up with military precision, like someone decided grief should obey spacing regulations.

Miles stands near the back, where no one expects him to speak.

The service is already underway by the time he arrives—quiet voices, the soft shuffle of shoes on gravel, the careful choreography of people who know exactly how they're supposed to behave when something goes wrong but not illegal. He clocks faces before emotions. Habit. Nyra is there, a few rows up, posture perfect, hands folded like she's on duty. Cassian Trude stands closer to the front, nodding at the right moments, offering the right expressions. He looks like a man attending a fundraiser, not a funeral.

Dewitt Avery doesn't stand anywhere obvious. He never does. Miles spots him anyway—off to the side, half-shadowed by a tree, sunglasses on despite the overcast. Like grief might recognize him if he showed his eyes.

No one looks surprised to see Miles.

That's the part that lands wrong.

The casket is closed. Flag-draped. Neutral. The kind you could project anything onto if you needed to. There's a small table nearby with a folded triangle of fabric already waiting, sharp and immaculate, like it hasn't been touched by human hands yet.

The speaker clears their throat.

They talk about service. About discretion. About the quiet burden of responsibility. They use phrases that feel practiced, sanded down until they could apply to anyone who ever kept a secret for a living. No name. No biography. Just a shape carved out of language.

Miles listens the way he always does—cataloging instead of feeling. Wind direction. Shoe brands. Who's carrying, who isn't. His mind refuses to settle on the obvious absence, so it inventories everything else.

He notices there's a gap in the crowd. A space that feels intentional, like a missing tooth everyone's pretending not to tongue.

Someone sniffles. Someone else doesn't.

Cassian steps forward when it's appropriate, murmurs something about dedication and loss. Nyra's jaw tightens for half a second, then smooths back into place. Dewitt never moves.

Miles doesn't cry. He doesn't bow his head. He doesn't step closer.

He thinks, absurdly, that there's a question he never answered.

The ceremony ends the way these things always do—efficient, contained, respectful. The flag is folded. Hands are shaken. People begin to drift, already transitioning back into the versions of themselves that function.

Miles stays where he is.

Only when the crowd thins does it hit him, sharp and uninvited:

there will be no follow-up.

No next appointment.
No voice asking him to slow down, or reframe, or finish a thought he's actively avoiding.
Whatever was buried today isn't just a body.
It's the last place he was honest.
Miles turns away before anyone can approach him.
Some losses don't need witnesses.
And whatever this was—whatever she was—
The system is already moving on.
He isn't.

1
The Last Question

The chair hasn't changed.

Same angle. Same low, intentional distance from the desk. Same faint scuff on the right armrest where someone once dragged a boot heel instead of lifting their foot like a civilized adult.

Miles notices this immediately. It feels important, even if he doesn't know why.

He sits without being asked. He always does. Waiting feels performative in rooms like this—an illusion of control layered over a requirement. He clasps his hands, then unclaspes them, then settles for resting his palms flat against his thighs.

The room smells like citrus cleaner and old paper. There's a ticking sound he can't quite place. Not a clock. Something smaller. Deliberate.

"You look tired," she says.

Not accusatory. Observational. Like a weather report.

"I slept," Miles replies.

"That's not what I said."

He exhales through his nose, almost a laugh. Almost. This is the rhythm. This is how it starts. He knows the steps well enough to dance them blind.

She doesn't write anything down yet. That's new—or maybe it isn't. He can't remember. Memory's been slippery lately, like it doesn't want to be examined too closely.

"Have the dreams changed?" she asks.

"No."

"That's an answer," she says, "but not the one I asked."

He tilts his head back, stares at the ceiling. There's a faint crack above the corner light fixture, hairline and ignored. He wonders how long it's been there. He wonders who noticed it first.

"They're quieter," he says finally. "Same content. Less noise."

Her pen moves now. Slow. Careful. Like she's choosing each word as much as recording it.

"And during the day?"

"I function."

"That's not an emotion."

"It's a skill."

That gets a reaction. Not a smile—she never wastes those—but a shift. She leans back slightly, studying him in a way that makes Miles feel both seen and invisible at the same time.

"You're still avoiding the building," she says.

"I'm avoiding people who pretend the building is the point."

She nods, once. Accepts it without agreement.

"Do you think that makes you safer?" she asks.

"No," Miles says. "I think it makes me quieter."

The ticking sound seems louder now. He resists the urge to locate it.

She watches him for a beat too long.

"Miles," she says, and this time his name carries weight. "When something keeps resurfacing, it's usually because it wasn't finished."

He stiffens before he can stop himself.

"Files don't resurface," he says. "People dig."

"Someone did," she replies.

He lowers his gaze. The floor is clean. Too clean. Like no one's been here since yesterday. Like this room resets itself between sessions.

"And if they find something?" he asks.

“That depends,” she says. “On whether you already know it’s there.”
Silence stretches. Not uncomfortable. Intentional.
“You’re allowed to say no,” she adds. “But you should know—you’ve been circling the same omission for months.”
He swallows.
“That’s not clinical language.”
“No,” she agrees. “It’s human language.”
Another pause. Longer.
“Do you ever wonder who you’d be,” she asks carefully, “if you weren’t useful to people who don’t intend to protect you?”
That lands harder than it should.
Miles shifts in the chair. The scuff mark catches his eye again.
“I don’t think that’s hypothetical,” he says.
Her pen stills.
“Then answer me this,” she says, quietly now. “If something happened because you stayed silent—would you recognize your own part in it?”
The question sits between them, heavy and unfinished.
Miles opens his mouth.
Then closes it.
He looks at her, really looks this time, like he’s about to memorize something without knowing why.
“We’re out of time,” she says gently, checking the clock he still hasn’t located.
He nods. Stands. Straightens his jacket.
At the door, he hesitates.
“Same time next—” he starts.
She doesn’t interrupt him.
He stops on his own.
“Yeah,” he says instead.

He leaves without looking back.
He never answers that question.

2

Normal, Until It Isn't

Miles doesn't go home right away.

He tells himself it's because traffic will be bad, which is a lie he doesn't bother correcting. He ends up walking instead, hands in his coat pockets, letting the city decide his pace. The air smells like wet pavement and coffee grounds—Monday smells. Ordinary smells. The kind that insist nothing is wrong.

His phone buzzes once.

Nyra.

You alive?

He stares at the screen longer than necessary, then types: Unfortunately.

Three dots appear. Disappear. Reappear.

We need to talk.

About what?

Another pause.

Don't do that.

He pockets the phone without replying. That trick used to work on other people. Nyra's immune.

He cuts through a side street he doesn't normally take and almost runs into Dewitt Avery coming the opposite way, as if the man has been summoned by neglect alone.

"Jesus," Miles mutters. "Do you have a tracking chip or do you just haunt places?"

Dewitt smiles. Same easy, expensive calm. "You wound me. I was just in the neighborhood."

“Of course you were.”
They stand there, two men pretending coincidence exists. Dewitt’s eyes flick briefly to Miles’ face—not searching, just checking a status bar.
“You look like someone moved a wall,” Dewitt says.
Miles shrugs. “I walked into it.”
“Ah,” Dewitt replies. “Those are the worst.”
Silence. Cars hiss past. Somewhere a horn blares, impatient with nothing.
“You going to ask?” Dewitt finally says.
“Ask what?”
“If I knew.”
Miles meets his gaze. “Did you?”
Dewitt’s smile thins. “I know lots of things.”
“That’s not an answer.”
“It’s the only one you’re getting for free.”
Miles nods once. Accepts it. He always does. Dewitt waits, like he’s expecting more—gratitude, maybe, or a favor to materialize out of the ether.
It doesn’t.
“Well,” Dewitt says lightly, stepping aside, “if you need anything… don’t.”
He walks off, already dialing someone else, already reallocating concern.
Miles exhales. The city rushes back in around him like it never left.

Evie is sitting cross-legged on the couch when he finally gets home, laptop balanced on her knees, earbuds in. She doesn’t look up when he closes the door.
“You’re late,” she says.
“So are you,” he replies.

She smirks. “I live here. You’re the one with mysterious adult appointments.”
He hangs his coat, watches her from the kitchen doorway. She’s humming softly—off-key, intentional. Her screen is filled with code that scrolls faster than it should.
“You eat?” he asks.
“Define eat.”
He grabs a container from the fridge, sets it in front of her. She peeks inside.
“Leftover curry,” she says. “Bold.”
“Living dangerously.”
She finally looks at him. Pauses.
“You’re doing the thing,” she says.
“What thing?”
“The quiet thing. The one where you’re technically present but mentally filing paperwork.”
Miles leans against the counter. “You’ve been hanging around federal employees too long.”
“Or,” Evie says, popping an earbud out, “I pay attention.”
She studies him the way people do when they already know the answer but want to see if you’ll lie anyway.
“Did something happen?” she asks.
Miles considers a dozen responses. Chooses the smallest.
“I talked to someone.”
“Someone you trust?”
He almost laughs. Almost.
“No,” he says.
Evie nods, satisfied in the way only smart teenagers can be when an adult confirms their suspicion.
“That tracks,” she says, returning to her screen. “Oh, by the way—someone tried to access my laptop at school today.”
Miles straightens. “Who.”

“No idea. They were bad at it. Like… embarrassingly bad.”
“That’s not comforting.”
“It kind of is,” she replies. “Means they didn’t expect me.”
He watches her fingers fly across the keys, muscle memory and instinct braided together.
“Did you report it?” he asks.
She tilts her head. “To who?”
Fair.
His phone buzzes again. Nyra, this time calling.
He lets it ring once. Twice.
Evie looks up. “You gonna answer that?”
“In a minute.”
She shrugs. “Your funeral.”
The word lands wrong.
Miles steps onto the balcony to take the call, shutting the door behind him.
“What,” he says.
Nyra doesn’t bother with pleasantries. “You skipped out.”
“I stayed until the end.”
“You disappeared.”
“So did everyone else.”
A beat.
“You talked to Dewitt,” she says.
Miles closes his eyes. “You people are exhausting.”
“Listen to me,” Nyra says, low now. “Things are moving. And whatever buffer you had? It’s gone.”
“That implies I ever had one.”
Another pause. This one heavier.
“They reassigned your evaluations,” she says.
Miles opens his eyes.
“Reassigned,” he repeats.
“Different contractor. New face. New paper trail.”

He grips the railing, knuckles whitening.
“When?”
“Soon,” Nyra replies. “Too soon.”
Miles looks back through the glass door. Evie laughs at something on her screen, carefree and brilliant and completely unguarded.
“Nyra,” he says quietly.
“Yes.”
“If someone stayed silent long enough… would they even notice when it finally mattered?”
She doesn’t answer right away.
“No,” she says at last. “But everyone else would.”
The line goes dead.
Miles stays on the balcony longer than necessary, staring at a city that doesn’t look any different than it did yesterday.
Inside, Evie calls out, “Hey—do you want to hear something funny?”
“Sure,” he says, turning back toward the light.
For now, everything still looks normal.
That’s the problem.

3

A Suitable Replacement

The new office is smaller.

Miles notices this immediately, though he can't say why it matters. Same building, different floor, different geometry. The chair is harder. The desk is newer. The walls are decorated with framed certifications instead of books that look like they've actually been read.

The man waiting for him stands when Miles enters.

That's strike one.

"Miles Long," the man says, offering a hand. "Dr. Ethan Hale."

Miles looks at the hand for half a beat longer than polite before shaking it.

"Have a seat," Hale says, already moving back behind the desk.

Miles sits. The chair doesn't creak. It doesn't remember anyone.

Dr. Hale flips open a folder. Crisp. Organized. Tabs color-coded like this is a long-term arrangement. He scans the top page, nodding to himself.

"I've reviewed your file," Hale says. "Extensively."

Miles resists the urge to ask which version.

"I want to be clear from the outset," Hale continues. "This is not therapy in the traditional sense. This is an evaluation. Ongoing. Structured. Outcome-oriented."

"Sounds fun," Miles replies.

Hale smiles. It's the kind of smile people learn in seminars.

“You’ve had… an unconventional relationship with prior evaluators,” he says carefully.
There it is.
“Define unconventional,” Miles says.
Hale consults the file again. “Lengthy. Informal. Excessive latitude given.”
Miles nods. “She asked questions.”
“Yes,” Hale agrees. “That’s noted.”
Something about the phrasing irritates him more than it should.
“Before we proceed,” Hale says, folding his hands, “I want to address expectations. This process is about determining fitness, compliance, and risk. Not… exploration.”
Miles leans back. “And if I’m not interested in compliance?”
Hale doesn’t miss a beat. “Then this will be very short.”
Silence stretches between them, but it’s a different kind than before. No weight. No curiosity. Just procedure.
“Let’s start simple,” Hale says. “Any changes in sleep patterns?”
“No.”
“Medication?”
“No.”
“Incidents of disassociation?”
Miles considers lying. Decides not to.
“Yes.”
Hale makes a note.
“Triggers?”
“People pretending not to notice things,” Miles says.
Hale pauses. Looks up.
“That’s vague.”
“It’s accurate.”
Another note. Firmer this time.

“Your previous evaluator,” Hale says, tone neutral, “allowed a level of narrative drift that won’t be productive here.”
Miles’ jaw tightens.
“She wasn’t unproductive.”
Hale raises an eyebrow. “The outcome suggests otherwise.”
That lands.
“Outcome,” Miles repeats.
Hale closes the folder.
“Her contract was terminated,” he says. “The Service requires consistency. Interchangeability.”
There it is.
Miles stares at the desk. Notices the absence of a coffee ring. No personal clutter. No crack in the ceiling to fixate on.
“When?” Miles asks.
Hale hesitates. Just long enough.
“Recently,” he says.
Miles exhales slowly through his nose.
“And the funeral?” he asks, casually. Like it’s a scheduling question.
Hale stiffens.
“That information isn’t relevant to your evaluation.”
Miles looks up.
“So it happened.”
Silence.
“Yes,” Hale says finally. “It did.”
Miles nods once. Acknowledges it like a confirmed kill.
Hale shifts in his chair. “You should understand—this transition is not punitive. It’s procedural.”
“Of course,” Miles replies. “She was… non-essential.”
Hale doesn’t correct him.
“That will be all for today,” Hale says, standing again. “We’ll meet weekly. Attendance is mandatory.”

Miles rises. Straightens his jacket.
At the door, he stops.
“Did she say anything before she left?” he asks, not turning around.
Hale consults the file one last time.
“No,” he says. “Nothing of note.”
Miles nods.
He leaves.
In the hallway, the building hums like it always has—alive, efficient, indifferent.
For the first time, Miles understands something with terrifying clarity:
She wasn’t reassigned.
She wasn’t replaced.
She was removed.
And everyone agreed to call it continuity.

4
Continuity

Miles reads the file twice.
Then a third time, slower, like maybe the words will rearrange themselves out of embarrassment.
They don't.
The header is bland. Administrative. A bureaucratic lullaby.
CORWIN, L. — STATUS: CLOSED
No explanation. No cause. No annotation beyond a date that sits there like a toe tag pretending to be a timestamp.
Closed.
Not deceased.
Not terminated.
Not killed.
Closed.
Miles exhales and leans back in his chair, the cheap hotel desk creaking under the shift. He's learned not to trust places with laminated furniture—too many secrets pass through them without staying long enough to leave fingerprints.
He checks the lock. Once. Then again.
Nyra had warned him not to dig.
That's usually when he digs.
The file metadata tells a different story than the document itself. Access logs spike three days before the funeral. Not panicked access—curated access. Someone reviewed, exported, redacted. Someone with authority and time.
Someone calm.

Miles scrolls until he hits the last note she entered.
Not flagged.
Not escalated.
Just… there.
Subject demonstrates advanced compartmentalization masked as functionality.
Risk is not volatility.
Risk is silence.
Miles stares at the sentence longer than he should.
“You didn’t even finish the thought,” he mutters.
A knock at the door snaps him upright.
He doesn’t reach for a weapon. That’s how he knows it’s Nyra.
He opens the door. She steps inside without invitation, coat still on, eyes already cataloging exits.
“You’re not answering calls,” she says.
“You are,” he replies.
She watches him for a beat. “You went into the file.”
“Don’t pretend you didn’t know I would.”
Nyra sighs and finally takes off her coat. Sets it carefully on the chair like this is a meeting, not an intervention.
“They’re watching access patterns,” she says. “Not content. Yet.”
“That’s comforting.”
“You’re on borrowed tolerance,” she adds.
Miles turns the laptop so she can see the screen.
She stiffens.
“They closed her,” he says.
Nyra’s jaw tightens. “I know.”
“You went to the funeral.”
“So did you.”
“You stayed after,” he says. “I didn’t.”

She looks away. Just for a second.
“She tried to escalate,” Nyra says quietly. “Not officially. She asked questions in the wrong order.”
Miles nods. “She always did.”
“They told her to stop.”
“And she didn’t.”
Nyra doesn’t answer. She doesn’t have to.
Miles closes the laptop.
“So what are we calling it?” he asks. “An accident? A complication? A tragic footnote?”
Nyra meets his eyes. “Continuity.”
The word hangs there, ugly and efficient.
Miles stands. Walks to the window. Watches the city do what it always does—move on.
“They reassigned my evaluations,” he says. “Different contractor.”
“I know.”
“He asked me about her like she was a formatting error.”
Nyra winces. “That tracks.”
Miles turns back to her.
“She was right,” he says. “About the silence.”
Nyra doesn’t argue.
“You’re not supposed to fix this,” she says carefully. “You’re supposed to survive it.”
Miles smiles, thin and humorless.
“That used to be the same thing.”
A beat.
Nyra reaches into her coat pocket and slides something onto the desk. A folded printout. Not official. Not logged.
“What’s this?” he asks.
She hesitates. “The part they didn’t close fast enough.”
Miles unfolds it.

It’s a fragment. A timestamp. A name that shouldn’t be adjacent to hers.
Cassian Trude.
Miles looks up.
Nyra’s voice is steady, but her eyes aren’t. “If you keep going, I can’t protect you.”
He nods. Accepts the truth.
“Then don’t,” he says. “Just don’t stop me.”
Nyra exhales. “You always do this.”
“Only when someone tells me to move on.”
Silence.
Outside, sirens wail. Somewhere, someone is having a worse day than they were yesterday.
Miles folds the paper carefully. Slips it into his jacket.
“Continuity,” he says again. “Funny word.”
Nyra watches him like she’s already doing the math on how bad this is going to get.
“Yeah,” she replies. “It is.”

5

Collateral

Miles doesn't sleep.
He lies on the bed fully dressed, one arm folded behind his head, staring at the ceiling like it might confess something if he gives it long enough. The hotel room hums with cheap electricity and recycled air. Every sound feels amplified, like the building is leaning in.
At 02:17, his phone vibrates.
Not a call.
A location ping.
Evie.
His body moves before his brain signs off on it.
He's halfway down the stairwell when the second message comes through.
Someone's here.
No punctuation. That's the tell.
Miles takes the steps two at a time, jacket flaring, pulse finally loud enough to drown out thought. He doesn't call Nyra. He doesn't call Dewitt. He makes the decision he knows he shouldn't.
He goes dark.

Evie is standing in the kitchen when he bursts through the door, laptop open, screen glowing with lines of code that are absolutely not homework.
"You need to relax," she says, way too fast. "You're gonna break the door."

“Who,” Miles says, scanning corners, windows, reflections.
“Was. Here.”
“No one in here,” she says. “Outside.”
That’s worse.
He moves to the window, peels the curtain back a fraction. The street looks normal. Too normal. Parked cars. A light down the block flickering like it’s thinking about dying.
“What did you do,” he asks.
Evie crosses her arms. Defensive. Guilty. Brilliant.
“I traced the access attempt,” she says. “The one from school.”
“You did what?”
“I followed it upstream. It was lazy. Sloppy. Like they didn’t expect resistance.”
Miles turns on her. “That wasn’t an invitation.”
“It was a challenge,” she snaps. Then, quieter: “And they noticed.”
His jaw tightens.
“Define noticed.”
She swivels the laptop so he can see. A log. IP hops. A timestamp from twenty minutes ago.
“They didn’t get in,” she says quickly. “But they knocked. Hard.”
Miles’ phone buzzes again.
Unknown number.
He answers without speaking.
“You’re making this messy,” a voice says. Calm. Male. Educated.
Miles closes his eyes.
“Stop watching my house,” he says.
A pause.

“You don’t have a house,” the voice replies. “You have leverage. And now… so do we.”
Miles glances at Evie. She’s gone pale, fingers clenched tight around the counter.
“Whatever this is,” Miles says evenly, “she’s not part of it.”
Another pause. Almost amused.
“She already is.”
The line goes dead.
Miles doesn’t hesitate. That’s the mistake.
He grabs the laptop.
“What are you doing?” Evie asks.
“Fixing it.”
“That’s not an answer.”
He plugs in a drive he hasn’t used in years. Old habits. Old ghosts.
“Go pack a bag,” he says. “Now.”
“You’re not my dad.”
“No,” he agrees. “I’m worse.”
Her eyes widen. “Miles—”
He looks at her. Really looks. Sees exactly what Lena warned him about and he ignored.
“This is my fault,” he says. “Which means it’s my responsibility.”
He hits ENTER.
Somewhere far away, alarms don’t go off—but people notice.
The system doesn’t like surprises.
Evie’s phone buzzes. Then buzzes again.
She looks at the screen.
“Miles,” she says softly.
“What.”
“They just locked my school account.”
He swallows.

That bad choice?
It just crossed a boundary.
And for the first time since the funeral, Miles feels something sharp and undeniable cut through the numbness:
This isn’t about him anymore.
And there will be consequences he can’t outrun.

6

Optics

Cassian Trude doesn't raise his voice.
He doesn't need to.
The conference room is glass on three sides, the city blurred beyond it like a suggestion rather than a destination. Everyone inside knows better than to look uncomfortable. Cassian likes that about this room—it trains people without them realizing it.
"Let's be clear," he says, folding his hands neatly on the table. "This is not disciplinary."
A few heads nod. No one writes that down.
"This is about risk management," he continues. "Perception. Containment."
A woman two seats down adjusts her glasses. "Sir, are we discussing Long?"
Cassian smiles. Not warmly. Precisely.
"We're discussing patterns," he says. "Miles Long is simply… adjacent."
He taps a remote. The screen behind him lights up with timelines. Access logs. Behavioral flags. All technically benign. All arranged to tell a story.
"He's no longer in the building," Cassian says. "But he keeps brushing up against it. That's not healthy—for him or for us."
Someone clears their throat. "With respect, Deputy Director, Long has external clearance—"
"—which can be reviewed," Cassian cuts in smoothly. "At any time."

Silence.
Cassian lets it sit. He enjoys this part—not the power, but the moment people realize where it lives.
“There’s also a minor,” he adds, almost casually. “Unrelated. Civilian. But proximity creates… optics.”
That gets attention.
“A child?” someone asks.
“A liability,” Cassian corrects. “One we don’t need.”
He clicks again. A new slide appears. School network. Access attempt. Flagged but unresolved.
“Nothing illegal,” Cassian says. “Yet. But if we’re proactive, we avoid headlines. Congressional curiosity. Internal review.”
He leans back.
“I want distance,” he says. “From Long. From anyone he’s been speaking to. Especially former contractors.”
No one asks which one.
Cassian doesn’t say her name.
He doesn’t have to.
“Reassign coverage,” he continues. “Slow any requests tied to his previous casework. And make sure our messaging is… consistent.”
A man at the end of the table hesitates. “And if Long pushes back?”
Cassian’s smile returns. Small. Polite.
“Then he confirms our concerns.”
Meeting adjourned. Chairs slide back. People gather papers they didn’t need.
Cassian remains seated.
When the room empties, he pulls out his phone and sends a single text.
It’s time.

He stands, straightens his jacket, and checks his reflection in the glass.
Everything still looks clean.
That’s how you know it’s working.

7

Triage

Nyra Jones knows when a room has decided something without her.

It's a feeling she's learned to trust—the subtle shift in air, the way conversations end a half-second too early when she walks in. The building hums differently today. Quieter. Careful. Like it's trying not to wake something.

She badges through anyway.

Her inbox is already a crime scene. Holds. Reassignments. "Pending review." Words that mean we're doing this without you.

She closes the door to her office and doesn't sit.

Miles Long is being isolated.

Not arrested. Not charged. Not even formally flagged. Just… separated from oxygen. Contacts rerouted. Requests slowed. Coverage "adjusted." It's the Service's favorite trick: make someone radioactive without ever saying the word.

And then there's the girl.

Nyra pulls up the secondary file—off-books, mislabeled, buried under a contractor's audit trail. Evie James. Minor. Civilian. Brilliant enough to be dangerous by accident.

Cassian's fingerprints are nowhere.

Which means they're everywhere.

Her phone buzzes. Internal.

She answers without greeting.

"You're boxing him in," Nyra says.

Cassian's voice is smooth, amused. "Good morning to you too."
"You dragged a kid into this."
"I acknowledged a variable," Cassian replies. "You're the one assigning sentiment."
Nyra pinches the bridge of her nose. "You know what happens if she gets spooked."
"I know what happens if Congress gets spooked," Cassian says. "Perspective."
"She's not leverage."
"Not intentionally," he agrees. "Which makes her effective."
Nyra exhales. Slow. Controlled.
"You're forcing a choice," she says.
Cassian doesn't deny it. "I'm clarifying priorities."
The line goes quiet.
Nyra stares at the wall, at a framed commendation she earned years ago for doing the right thing in the wrong way.
She makes a decision.

Miles answers on the third ring.
"Say you're fine," Nyra says immediately.
A beat. "I'm not."
"Okay," she says. "Then listen carefully."
She doesn't ask where he is. She doesn't ask what he did.
She doesn't want details she can't un-know.
"They're going to make you the problem," she says. "Not publicly. Internally. That gives them time."
"And Evie?"
Nyra closes her eyes.
"She's the pressure point."
Silence. He understands immediately. That's what scares her.

“You can’t protect both,” she continues. “Not the way this is moving.”
“I didn’t ask you to choose,” Miles says.
“No,” Nyra replies. “Cassian did.”
Another pause. Longer.
“If you keep pushing,” Nyra says, “they’ll escalate around her. School. Social services. ‘Concerned adults.’ They won’t hurt her. They’ll just… rearrange her life until she disappears from yours.”
Miles’ voice drops. “And if I stop?”
“Then they leave her alone,” Nyra says. “And you become manageable.”
Manageable. The word tastes like ash.
“You’re asking me to walk away,” he says.
“I’m telling you the cost of not doing it.”
She waits for him to argue.
He doesn’t.
“That thing Lena flagged,” he says quietly. “They didn’t close it clean.”
Nyra’s stomach tightens. “Miles—”
“I know,” he says. “But if I let this go now, she died for nothing.”
Nyra swallows hard.
“You’re assuming she died for something,” she says.
Miles doesn’t hesitate. “She did.”
Nyra leans back in her chair, staring at the ceiling. The crack above the light fixture is new. Or maybe she’s only just noticing it.
“Then here’s the truth,” she says. “If you take one more step toward that file, I won’t be able to warn you anymore.”
“I figured,” he replies.
“And if Evie gets pulled in—really pulled in—I’ll choose her.”

Miles nods, though she can’t see it. “You should.”
Silence stretches between them. Not hostile. Final.
“Nyra,” he says. “When this breaks… I need you clean.”
She closes her eyes.
“I don’t think that’s an option anymore,” she says.
The call ends.
Nyra sits alone in her office, the building humming like a living thing that’s already decided what it needs to survive.
Somewhere else, a man is about to touch the edge of the thing that got a woman killed.
And a girl is standing exactly where systems like this start making mistakes.
Nyra reaches for her coat.
Triage means you don’t save everyone.
It means you decide who lives with what comes next.

8

For Her Own Good

Evie doesn't notice the woman at first.
That's the problem.
She's too busy being annoyed—by the slow Wi-Fi, by the outdated terminal she's been assigned, by the fact that the guidance office smells like lemon disinfectant and disappointment. She swivels in her chair, cracking her neck, when the woman finally speaks.
"Evie James?"
Her tone is warm. Reassuring. Weaponized calm.
"Yes?" Evie replies, already clocking the badge. County seal. Not school. Interesting.
"I'm Dana Whitaker," the woman says, smiling. "I work with youth outreach services. We just wanted to have a quick chat."
Wanted is doing a lot of work there.
Evie glances at the clock. "I have math in six minutes."
Dana nods sympathetically. "We'll be quick."
They always say that.

The room has no windows.
Evie notices this immediately. Notices the strategically placed plant, the framed poster about Healthy Boundaries, the way the chairs are angled slightly toward each other—collaborative, not confrontational.
Dana folds her hands.
"We've had some concerns raised," she says gently.

“About?”
“You.”
Evie blinks. “I’m delightful.”
Dana smiles. “You’re very intelligent.”
That’s strike one.
“We’ve noticed some… unusual network activity tied to your school account.”
Evie feels her stomach tighten. She doesn’t show it.
“Unusual isn’t illegal,” she says.
“No,” Dana agrees. “But it can be indicative.”
“Of what?”
“Stress,” Dana says. “Isolation. Lack of appropriate adult supervision.”
Evie leans back in her chair. “I have supervision.”
Dana tilts her head. “Your guardian travels. Frequently.”
Here it is.
“And when he’s not traveling?” Dana continues. “He’s… distracted.”
Evie’s jaw sets. “You don’t know him.”
“We know of him,” Dana replies softly. “And that’s enough to raise questions.”
Evie’s phone buzzes in her pocket. She ignores it.
“What kind of questions?” she asks.
Dana slides a folder across the table. Thin. Surgical.
“Whether your current environment is in your best interest.”
Evie doesn’t open it.
“You don’t get to say that,” she says. “I haven’t done anything wrong.”
Dana sighs—not frustrated, just disappointed.
“This isn’t about wrong,” she says. “It’s about risk.”
That word again.

“Someone tried to access your personal devices,” Dana continues. “That’s concerning.”
Evie’s pulse spikes. “Someone failed.”
Dana’s smile tightens. “That confidence worries us.”
Evie stands.
“I’m leaving.”
Dana doesn’t stop her. That’s how you know it’s real.
“Of course,” Dana says. “But before you go—there may be a temporary adjustment.”
Evie freezes.
“Adjustment?” she repeats.
“School placement,” Dana says calmly. “Housing review. Just until we’re comfortable.”
Evie’s breath catches despite herself.
“You can’t do that without proof.”
Dana meets her eyes.
“We don’t need proof,” she says. “We need cause.”
Evie thinks of Miles. Of the way he told her to pack a bag. Of the thing she didn’t tell him yet.
Her phone buzzes again. She pulls it out.
MILES: where are you
Evie looks up.
Dana is already standing, already opening the door.
“Go to class,” Dana says kindly. “We’ll be in touch.”

Evie walks down the hallway like nothing is wrong.
That’s the hardest part.
Students laugh. Lockers slam. The world continues like it always has, oblivious to the fact that a decision has already been made about her.
She ducks into a bathroom stall and finally lets her hands shake.

She types fast.
EVIE: they know
EVIE: not everything
EVIE: but enough
EVIE: I think they’re going to move me
Three dots appear.
Disappear.
Reappear.
MILES: stay where you are
MILES: don’t talk to anyone else
MILES: I’m coming
Evie closes her eyes.
For the first time, she understands something Lena tried to warn him about.
Silence isn’t safety.
It’s just the moment before someone decides for you.
And somewhere else—quietly, professionally—
a system is preparing to protect her.
Whether she wants it or not.

9

Menace

Miles doesn't drive to the school.
That would be predictable.
He parks three blocks away, walks the rest, hoodie up, head down, counting cameras by instinct. Too many eyes in the obvious places. None where they actually matter. He clocks the rhythm of dismissal, the way authority thins when it assumes compliance.
They expect him to call a lawyer.
They expect him to request a meeting.
They expect him to behave like someone who still believes rules are neutral.
They are wrong.
Evie spots him first.
She's standing near the side entrance, backpack slung too casually over one shoulder, phone in hand like she's scrolling instead of waiting. When their eyes meet, something in her expression tightens—not fear, not relief. Recognition.
"You're not supposed to be here," she says when he reaches her.
"I know," Miles replies. "That's why I came."
She snorts despite herself. "Figures."
He steers her toward the alley without touching her. He's careful about that now. Witnesses love hands.
"Did they say 'temporary'?" he asks.
"Yes."
"That's a lie."

“Obviously.”
“They’ll try again,” he says. “Sooner.”
Evie nods. “They already pulled my attendance record. Retroactively.”
Miles exhales. Sharp. Controlled.
“That means Cassian signed off,” he mutters.
Evie tilts her head. “You’re saying that like I know who that is.”
“You don’t,” he says. “And I want to keep it that way.”
They reach the alley mouth. Miles stops.
“Listen to me,” he says. “From this moment on, you don’t solve things alone. You don’t get clever. You don’t poke systems.”
Evie raises an eyebrow. “You raised me.”
“I know,” he says quietly. “That’s the problem.”
Her phone buzzes.
A blocked number.
They both look at it.
Evie doesn’t answer.
Miles takes the phone from her hand and answers for her.
“Wrong number,” he says.
Cassian’s voice is unmistakable. Smooth. Amused.
“I disagree,” Cassian replies. “I think I reached exactly who I wanted.”
Miles smiles. It’s not friendly.
“You’re calling a minor,” he says. “That’s sloppy.”
“Only if it’s recorded,” Cassian answers. “Is it?”
Miles glances at Evie.
“No,” he says. “But I am.”
Cassian chuckles softly. “You always were dramatic.”
“You put a county worker on a kid,” Miles says. “That’s not optics. That’s intimidation.”

“That’s concern,” Cassian corrects. “She’s brilliant. Unsupervised brilliance tends to… wander.”
Evie leans closer, listening.
“You move her,” Miles says, “and I stop playing nice.”
Cassian pauses.
“Nice,” he repeats. “Is that what you think you’ve been doing?”
Miles’ voice drops. “I haven’t started yet.”
Silence. Then—
“You’re walking toward the same edge she did,” Cassian says. “You should ask yourself why she didn’t step back.”
Miles’ grip tightens.
“You don’t get to say her,” he says.
Cassian exhales, unbothered. “I already did.”
The line goes dead.
Evie looks up at Miles.
“Okay,” she says. “That felt… important.”
Miles hands the phone back.
“Here’s what’s going to happen,” he says. “You’re coming with me. Tonight.”
“Running?”
“Relocating,” he corrects. “Temporarily.”
Evie hesitates. “And you?”
Miles looks out at the street, the cameras, the neat little grid of a world that thinks it owns people.
“I’m going to remind them,” he says, “why they used to be careful with me.”
Evie swallows. “That sounds like how people end up dead.”
Miles meets her eyes.
“So does doing nothing.”
They move.

Across town, in a glass office, Cassian Trude reviews a feed with mild interest.
Miles Long has stopped reacting.
That’s the moment Cassian’s smile finally fades.
Because men like Miles don’t burn down buildings.
They rearrange them.
And everyone standing inside pretends they didn’t see it coming.

10
Residuals

The place isn't safe.
That's why it works.
Miles chose it years ago—an obsolete records annex slated for renovation that never quite happened. No permanent staff. No live feeds. The kind of building the system forgets exists until it needs to bury something quietly.
Evie sits cross-legged on a folding chair, laptop balanced on her knees like she's pretending this is normal.
"This is extremely illegal," she says.
Miles plugs in the drive. "So is most useful history."
The lights flicker once, then settle. Dust hangs in the air like it's waiting to be disturbed.
"Listen to me," Miles says, turning to her. "What I'm about to look at? You do not touch."
Evie doesn't look up. "I wasn't planning to."
He believes her. Mostly.
The drive spins. Old encryption. Familiar. The kind you only use when you don't want anyone clever poking around.
Miles types a string of commands he hasn't used since before he disappeared.
The screen fills with text.
Session timestamps.
Cross-references.
Annotations that don't belong in a psych file.
Miles' stomach tightens.
"This isn't evaluation," he murmurs.

Evie glances up. “What is it?”
“Pattern recognition,” he says. “She was mapping behavior. Not mine. Everyone else’s.”
He scrolls.
Flags begin to appear—not names, not yet. Just clusters. Authority nodes. Silence corridors. Decision bottlenecks.
Someone trained her to look like this.
Or she taught herself.
Miles stops scrolling.
There it is.
A partial note. Time-stamped three days before her file was closed.
If the silence spreads upward, the risk isn’t exposure.
It’s normalization.
Once they agree not to see it, they can justify anything.
Evie swallows. “That sounds like a manifesto.”
“That sounds like a warning,” Miles replies.
Another file auto-opens.
Access attempt: BLOCKED
Followed by: OVERRIDE REQUESTED
Followed by: DENIED
Miles’ jaw tightens.
“She tried to escalate,” he says. “And someone said no.”
Evie’s fingers twitch near the keyboard.
“Don’t,” Miles says sharply.
She freezes. Looks up. “I wasn’t—”
“I know,” he says. Softer. “Just… don’t.”
He scrolls again.
Names begin to resolve—not complete, not confirmed. Initials. Roles. One sits at the center of more lines than the others.
C.T.

Miles closes the laptop.
Hard.
Evie exhales. “You okay?”
“No,” he says immediately. “But now I understand why she didn’t stop.”
“And why she ended up like—” Evie stops herself.
Miles nods. “Yeah.”
Silence settles. Heavy. Real.
“So what now?” Evie asks.
Miles looks at the dark screen like it might still bite him.
“Now,” he says, “we put this back where it was.”
Evie blinks. “You’re kidding.”
“If this goes live before we’re ready,” he says, “we become her.”
She doesn’t argue. That scares him more than if she had.
Miles ejects the drive, pockets it, and powers everything down.
Outside, a door slams somewhere in the building.
Evie stiffens. “Did you hear that?”
Miles already has his hand up.
Footsteps. Measured. Not security. Not police.
Someone who knows the place.
Miles leans in, voice low. “If this goes sideways, you leave. You don’t wait. You don’t look back.”
Evie shakes her head. “I’m not leaving you.”
“That’s not your choice,” he says.
The footsteps stop just outside the room.
A shadow passes under the door.
Miles realizes something with cold clarity:
Lena didn’t die because she went too far.
She died because she went far enough for someone to notice—and not far enough to be untouchable.

And now…
They’re standing in exactly the same distance.
Miles shifts his weight, readying himself.
Whatever comes next, one thing is already certain:
The system doesn’t forgive curiosity.
And it never leaves witnesses alone.

11

No Knock

The door doesn't open.

It moves.

Just enough for the handle to dip, the latch to test resistance, the person on the other side confirming exactly what kind of room they're dealing with.

Miles exhales through his nose.

"Stay behind me," he murmurs.

Evie doesn't argue. That's how he knows she's scared.

The handle turns again—slow this time. Controlled. Whoever it is isn't rushing. They're signaling.

Miles steps forward and pulls the door open himself.

The man outside is older than he expected. Late forties. Early fifties. No uniform. No weapon visible. Hands open. Calm eyes. The kind of guy who looks like he teaches leadership seminars and moonlights as a problem.

"Mr. Long," the man says pleasantly. "You're trespassing."

"You are too," Miles replies.

The man smiles. "I have better paperwork."

Miles clocks the stance. Balanced. Ready. This isn't security. This is containment.

"You have a minor with you," the man continues, glancing past him. "That complicates things."

Miles doesn't move.

"You followed us," he says.

"Yes."

"You were sloppy."

“No,” the man replies. “You wanted to be followed. You just didn’t want to know by who.”
Fair.
The man reaches into his jacket slowly, deliberately, and pulls out a laminated badge. Federal. Vague. Real enough to matter.
“We’re not here to arrest you,” he says. “We’re here to reset the board.”
Evie’s voice cuts in from behind Miles. “You don’t get to do that.”
The man looks at her for the first time. Really looks.
“Oh,” he says softly. “You’re the variable.”
Miles’ jaw tightens. “You say that again and this goes sideways.”
The man raises a hand. “Relax. If we wanted force, this would already be over.”
“Then why are you here?” Miles asks.
The man meets his eyes.
“Because Dr. Corwin left something unfinished,” he says. “And you just touched it.”
Silence.
“You shouldn’t have done that,” the man adds—not threatening, almost regretful.
Miles steps closer. “Then why am I still standing?”
The man’s smile fades.
“Because Deputy Director Trude hasn’t decided what you’re worth yet.”
That’s the line.
That’s when Miles knows this isn’t a scare tactic. It’s a pause.
“You’re going to walk away from this building,” the man says. “You’re going to put whatever you took back where it belongs. And the girl goes home.”

Evie laughs. Sharp. “You don’t even know what he took.”
The man looks at her again, longer this time.
“That,” he says, “is why you scare people.”
Miles feels the moment tightening—the one where compliance is still an option, but only barely.
“No,” Miles says.
The word lands heavy.
The man exhales. “I was hoping you wouldn’t say that.”
Miles’ voice drops. “You’re standing in a place that doesn’t officially exist, talking to a man you don’t want to make a martyr, about a woman you already silenced. You don’t have leverage.”
The man studies him.
Then nods.
“Okay,” he says. “Then here’s the truth you haven’t reached yet.”
He leans in just enough.
“She didn’t die because of what she found.”
Miles’ blood goes cold.
“She died,” the man continues, “because she was about to prove it.”
The man steps back.
“You have three days,” he says. “After that, this stops being procedural.”
He turns and walks away without another word.
Miles closes the door.
Locks it.
Evie finally speaks. “That was… bad.”
Miles nods slowly.
“Yeah,” he says. “That was the warning shot.”

12

The Girl Who Didn't Wait

Miles sleeps like a man who doesn't believe he deserves it. Not peacefully—never peacefully—but deeply, as if his body finally found a brief gap in the schedule of dread and decided to take it without asking permission. He's stretched out on a battered couch in the annex office, one forearm over his eyes, boots still on. The kind of sleep that looks less like rest and more like temporary system failure.

Evie watches him for a minute longer than she should.

She's not sentimental. Not in the obvious way. But there's something about seeing him unconscious—unguarded, unplugged from the vigilance that makes him him—that puts a strange weight in her chest. Like the world is holding its breath over him.

She looks away before that feeling can grow teeth.

The laptop hums softly on the folding table. The only steady sound in the room besides the building's old ventilation system exhaling dust through forgotten ducts. The annex smells like paper rot and cheap electrical heat—the scent of things that were meant to be permanent and turned out to be disposable.

Evie pulls the chair closer and opens the machine.

She doesn't touch the drive in Miles' pocket. She doesn't touch Lena's files. That's the line he drew, and she understands lines. She just doesn't respect lines that confuse obedience with intelligence.

Instead, she opens the logs.

Not content—contact.
Requests, denials, reroutes. The dull, unsexy anatomy of a system that would rather die than admit it has a spine.
Evie scrolls until patterns start appearing the way constellations do—only visible once you stop insisting the sky is random.
There.
A cluster of access spikes three days before the funeral. Not frantic. Not chaotic. Planned. Someone reviewed entries in a specific order. Someone exported. Someone scrubbed.
She highlights it.
Her fingers move fast, the way they always have when she's trying to make the world behave logically. She tags timestamps. Groups them. Builds a heat map of attention.
It's not hacking.
It's… autopsy.
She glances toward Miles again. He hasn't moved. His breathing is steady, but shallow, like even asleep he doesn't trust air.
Good.
Because what she's doing right now is the kind of thing that changes how people look at you once they know.
Evie keeps going.
At first it looks like exactly what you'd expect: a file is opened, a file is closed, a file is "reviewed." Procedure. Bureaucratic housekeeping.
But then she notices something Lena must have noticed too—because it repeats.
Every time the file gets close to anything sharp, it doesn't get deleted.
It gets reassigned.

A denial comes from one inbox, then the same request resurfaces under a new department code. A name vanishes and returns as an initial. A contractor becomes a “vendor.” A review becomes a “wellness check.”

Nobody kills the truth.

They move it.

They shove responsibility across the table so many times that eventually no one remembers whose hands it started in.

Evie stares at the screen, mouth slightly open, like she’s offended by the elegance of it.

“Oh,” she whispers. “That’s how you do it.”

She pulls up another set of logs—her own. The access attempt at school. The “concerned” knock that followed. The timing is too neat, too confident. Someone didn’t just notice her. Someone anticipated what she would do next.

Evie’s stomach tightens.

She’s been playing checkers on a board that isn’t checkers.

She exhales slowly and does something she knows Miles would hate.

She builds a map.

Not a map of crimes. She doesn’t have proof. Not yet. But proof isn’t the point.

It’s the shape.

The shape of attention.

The shape of refusal.

The shape of silence.

She creates a simple node diagram. Clean and unromantic. Roles instead of names. A handful of initials where the patterns converge.

And right at the center—like the hub of a wheel—two letters show up more often than coincidence allows.

C.T.

Evie stares at it.
It's not a name.
It's a gravity well.
She minimizes the window and opens a blank document. For a moment she just sits there, hands hovering over the keyboard, listening to Miles breathe and the building hum.
She knows what this is.
Not because she's watched spy movies or read thrillers or thinks she's special.
Because she's lived long enough in Miles' orbit to know the rules of people like him:
When someone tells you something is "procedural," it means it's personal.
When someone says "for your own good," it means you're about to lose choices.
When a file gets "closed," it means someone made a decision without having the courage to say it out loud.
Evie types one line at the top of the page.
If you can't prove it, prove they're hiding it.
Then she creates a second document—smaller, uglier, disposable.
A breadcrumb.
A single piece of bait that looks like a teenager being reckless instead of a teenager being deliberate.
She packages it the way she'd package anything meant to be found: sloppy enough to feel real, sharp enough to draw blood.
Her cursor pauses over SEND.
Her heart pounds in a way that annoys her.
She looks toward Miles again.
He hasn't moved.

If she wakes him, he'll stop her.
If she doesn't, she'll be alone with whatever comes next.
Evie presses SEND.
The laptop fan kicks up slightly, like the machine is nervous too.
She sits back, hands in her lap, and watches the screen as if staring harder will control outcomes.
Two minutes pass.
Nothing.
Three.
Her phone buzzes once.
A calendar invite tries to auto-load and fails.
Then her school portal pings and glitches.
Then—like someone tapping a fish tank to see what swims toward the glass—another ping hits.
Not a full breach.
A touch.
Evie's breath catches.
"Oh, you saw it," she whispers.
The building remains quiet. Miles remains asleep.
And Evie realizes, with a clarity so sharp it almost feels like relief:
She didn't just leave a breadcrumb.
She just proved something else.
Someone out there is watching her the way you watch a door you expect to open.
Evie closes the laptop gently, like she's putting an animal back in its cage.
She stands and walks to the windowless door, listening.
Nothing.
No footsteps. No handle testing. No polite knock.
Yet.

She turns back and looks at Miles.
He’s still asleep, face turned slightly toward the wall, as if even unconscious he refuses to look at anything that might ask something of him.
Evie swallows.
She doesn’t wake him.
She doesn’t run.
She sits back down and opens the laptop again, calm settling over her like a second skin.
Because if the system is going to move her, label her, reroute her life like an inconvenience—
Then it’s going to have to do it while she’s watching.
And this time, she’s not waiting for permission.

13
Three Days

Cassian Trude prefers meetings that end early.
Not because he's impatient—he isn't. Cassian can sit in silence longer than most people can stand. He prefers early endings because they leave people with unfinished sentences. Unasked questions. The feeling that the real conversation happened somewhere else.
It keeps everyone slightly off-balance.
He stands at the head of the conference table, hands relaxed at his sides, suit immaculate. The windows behind him look out over the city like the building is judging it. A pale morning light bleaches everything into manageable shades.
"Let's keep this narrow," Cassian says.
Narrow is his favorite word. Narrow means control.
The room is small—intentionally. No spectators. No ambitious juniors. No idealists. Just those with the habit of obedience and the capacity for selective hearing.
He doesn't mention Miles Long's name at first.
He doesn't have to.
He clicks a remote and a screen wakes up.
A timeline appears. A clean graphic. Times and dates. A few system logs. A highlighted spike in activity that looks accidental if you don't know how to read it.
Cassian watches the room watch the screen.
"An anomaly," someone says.
Cassian smiles pleasantly, as if the person has performed a useful trick.

“Yes,” he replies. “An anomaly. Not a crisis.”
He lets that settle.
Then he adds, almost casually, “But crises are just anomalies you ignored too long.”
A quiet shift travels around the table. Small body language. Eyes narrowing. Pens readying themselves.
Cassian taps the screen again.
Another box opens. Not labeled as sensitive. Not red. Not dramatic.
YOUTH OUTREACH CONTACT — SCHOOL NETWORK REVIEW
“Who authorized this?” a woman asks, eyebrows knitting.
Cassian turns slightly toward her, the way you might turn toward someone who’s asked a smart question in the wrong room.
“No one,” he says gently. “Which is why it’s happening.”
A man near the end clears his throat. “Sir—this is a minor.”
Cassian nods once, patient.
“Yes,” he says. “A minor with unusual network behavior, proximity to a volatile former asset, and no institutional containment.”
He pauses. The word hangs there.
“Containment,” Cassian repeats. “Not punishment.”
Someone shifts in their chair.
“Are we discussing removal?” another voice asks.
Cassian’s eyes flick briefly to the speaker, not hostile—evaluative. He’s deciding how dangerous this person is.
“We are discussing options,” Cassian answers. “Removal is only necessary when a situation becomes public.”
The silence that follows is the sound of everyone understanding the rule:
Keep it quiet, and you can do anything.

Cassian clicks again. A new slide.
EVALUATION REASSIGNMENT CONFIRMATION — LONG, M.
“Dr. Hale is reporting,” the woman with glasses says.
“Yes,” Cassian replies. “He’s predictable. That’s why we selected him.”
“And the prior contractor—” someone begins.
Cassian doesn’t allow the name.
“The prior contractor,” he repeats smoothly, “is no longer relevant.”
He folds his hands, elbows slightly bent, posture easy. Like he’s discussing staffing changes, not a death that has already altered the orbit of everyone in the room.
“Your job is not to solve anything,” Cassian continues. “Your job is to prevent interference.”
He steps to the side, lets the screen glow in the room’s peripheral vision.
“Miles Long has always been a magnet,” Cassian says. “He attracts attention. Loyalty. Distrust. He is the type of man who makes people pick sides.”
He looks around the table.
“We are not picking sides,” he says. “We are managing risk.”
A beat.
“You have three days,” Cassian adds.
The room stiffens.
“Three days for what?” the man at the end asks.
Cassian smiles, almost fond.
“For him to remember what he is,” Cassian says. “A former agent. Not an active variable.”
“And if he doesn’t?” someone asks.
Cassian’s smile fades slightly, like a curtain drawing back.
“Then we stop pretending this is procedural.”
No one asks what that means. They all know.

Cassian clicks the remote one final time. The screen goes dark.
Meeting over. Chairs shift. Papers gather. People stand with the eager stiffness of professionals who want to leave without looking alarmed.
Cassian remains.
He watches them file out, one by one, until only the woman with glasses lingers, hesitating.
“Sir,” she says quietly.
Cassian turns.
“What exactly are we trying to prevent?”
Cassian studies her. Measures her.
Then answers, because the best way to control a person is to give them just enough truth to bind them to the lie.
“We’re preventing the story,” he says. “Not the act.”
The woman swallows. Nods once. Leaves.
Cassian stands alone in the glass room and looks out over the city.
He isn’t angry. He isn’t panicked.
He’s… annoyed.
Annoyed that Miles Long is back in motion.
Annoyed that a child has made herself visible.
Annoyed that a dead contractor’s work is still vibrating in the walls like a struck bell.
He reaches into his pocket and pulls out his phone.
No hesitation. No drama.
One text.
It’s time.
He pockets the phone, smooths his sleeve, and checks his reflection in the glass.
Everything looks clean.
That’s what he likes most about power.

It always looks like nothing at all.

14

The Second Death

The news alert comes in the way bad news always does now—quietly, impersonally, disguised as information.

Miles is standing by the annex window when his phone vibrates. He doesn't look at it right away. He's learned that instinct. The city outside is gray and indifferent, traffic moving with the confidence of people who believe consequences happen to other people.

The phone vibrates again.

Evie looks up from her laptop. "You gonna check that?"

"In a second," Miles says.

The third vibration is shorter. Sharper. Nyra's cadence.

He exhales once and unlocks the screen.

SINGLE VEHICLE COLLISION — ROUTE 17
NO OTHER PARTIES INVOLVED
MALE, MID-40s — PRONOUNCED AT SCENE

Miles feels it before he reads the name.

He scrolls.

There's a grainy traffic cam still, timestamped just before dawn. A sedan folded around a concrete divider at an angle that looks wrong—too clean, too final. No skid marks visible in the frame. No attempt to correct.

Evie watches his face change.

"Who?" she asks.

Miles doesn't answer immediately. His thumb taps the screen, opening a secondary link—local coverage, barely an article.

Three paragraphs. A quote from a state trooper about speed and poor visibility.
Then the name.
He locks the phone.
Evie swallows. “That was… the guy. The one at the door.”
Miles nods once.
“The annex visitor,” he says. “Yeah.”
“That was fast,” Evie says.
“No,” Miles replies. “That was scheduled.”
He moves to the table and sits heavily, elbows braced on his knees. The room feels smaller now. Like the walls leaned in while they weren’t looking.
“They didn’t even bother with a narrative,” Evie says. “Just… physics.”
Miles nods again. “That’s how you know it wasn’t punishment.”
She frowns. “What was it, then?”
“A correction,” he says. “He talked.”
Evie’s stomach twists. “To who?”
“Doesn’t matter,” Miles replies. “What matters is he was useful right up until he wasn’t.”
Evie stares at the dark laptop screen. The breadcrumb she dropped sits there invisibly, like a wire stretched across a road.
“This is because of me,” she says.
Miles looks at her sharply. “No.”
“I left the trail,” she insists. “They followed it. They sent him. And now he’s—”
“Stop,” Miles says.
She doesn’t.
“He warned us,” Evie continues, voice shaking now. “He said three days. And he didn’t even make it one.”

Miles leans forward, forearms on his thighs, voice low and steady. “Listen to me. This wasn’t about timing.”
“Then what was it about?”
Miles hesitates.
Truth is a tool. You don’t swing it unless you know where it lands.
“It was about discipline,” he says finally. “Not ours. Theirs.”
Evie’s eyes narrow. “You mean—”
“He crossed an internal line,” Miles says. “Not by coming here. By saying too much afterward.”
Evie wraps her arms around herself. “So what are we to them?”
Miles meets her gaze.
“We’re not people,” he says. “We’re variables.”
Silence settles hard between them.
Evie exhales shakily. “So this is it. This is where we either disappear or—”
“—or we get very deliberate,” Miles finishes.
She studies him. “You don’t sound scared.”
“I am,” he says. “I’m just not confused anymore.”
Evie looks away. “Lena wasn’t either. Was she.”
Miles closes his eyes.
“No,” he says quietly. “She knew exactly what it cost. She just thought the cost would be hers alone.”
Evie’s phone buzzes.
She jumps this time.
Miles holds up a hand. “Let me.”
He takes the phone. Unknown number. Same as before.
He answers without speaking.
The voice on the other end is different this time. Younger. Tighter.
“That was unfortunate,” the voice says.

Miles' jaw tightens. "You don't get to comment."
"On the contrary," the voice replies. "I'm calling to reassure you."
Miles almost laughs.
"Reassure me," he says.
"Yes," the voice continues. "That what happened this morning has nothing to do with your... associate."
Miles glances at Evie.
"Of course it doesn't," he says. "It has to do with the fact that he talked."
A pause.
"That's an interesting assumption," the voice replies.
Miles leans back in his chair. "You people love assumptions. That's why you keep mistaking silence for agreement."
Another pause. Longer.
"You're burning your margin," the voice says. "And you're putting the girl at risk."
Miles' voice hardens. "You don't threaten minors."
"We don't threaten," the voice replies. "We predict."
The line goes dead.
Miles hands the phone back to Evie.
She looks at him, eyes wide. "That wasn't Cassian."
"No," Miles says. "That was someone who reports to someone who reports to Cassian."
Evie swallows. "So what now?"
Miles stands.
Now he looks tired. Older. Sharper.
"Now," he says, "we stop assuming this ends clean."
Evie nods slowly. "Someone died."
"Yes," Miles says. "And that was the message."
He looks back at the windowless door, at the invisible hallway beyond it.

“They just told us the rules,” he continues. “No witnesses. No martyrs. No loose ends.”
Evie’s voice is barely above a whisper. “And Lena?”
Miles meets her eyes.
“She became a proof of concept,” he says.
Outside, somewhere in the city, traffic flows around a folded piece of wreckage already being cleared away.
By evening, it will be gone.
By tomorrow, it will be forgotten.
But in the annex, the air has changed.
Because now Evie understands something Lena learned too late—
The system doesn’t kill you to stop you.
It kills someone else to teach you where the edge is.
And Miles Long is standing right on it.

15
Containment

Nyra Jones deletes the message before she finishes reading it.
Not because she doesn't understand it—but because she does.
TEMPORARY MEASURES AUTHORIZED PENDING REVIEW
DO NOT ENGAGE SUBJECT DIRECTLY
It's the kind of language that pretends it isn't making a choice. The kind that lets everyone involved sleep at night while someone else pays for the decision.
Nyra stands in the hallway outside her office, phone in hand, watching agents move past her with purpose that has nothing to do with her anymore. The building hasn't shut her out yet, but it's started to behave like she's already gone.
She steps inside and closes the door.
Locks it.
That alone would've meant something once.
She opens the secure terminal and pulls up the internal escalation chain—buried deep, mislabeled, accessed only when something has already gone wrong. Miles Long's name sits there like a pressure fracture. Not flagged. Not charged. Just… annotated.
She scrolls.
Containment doesn't mean arrest.
Containment doesn't mean confrontation.

Containment means you limit movement, slow time, reduce oxygen.
It means you make someone smaller without ever touching them.
Nyra exhales through her nose and leans back in her chair.
Cassian didn't ask her to do this.
That's how she knows he expects her to.
Her phone buzzes.
Internal line.
She answers without greeting.
"You're close to this," Cassian says calmly. "Which is why I wanted you looped in early."
"Early," Nyra repeats. "You already sent a county worker after a kid."
"A review," Cassian corrects. "And it worked. She's rattled. She's visible."
"She's a minor."
"So was the problem," Cassian replies. "Now it's defined."
Nyra grips the arm of her chair. "You're forcing him."
"I'm containing him," Cassian says. "There's a difference."
"You always say that."
"And I'm usually right."
Silence stretches.
"Walk me through the next step," Nyra says.
Cassian doesn't hesitate. "We stall his access. We flag his movements. We let pressure do what pressure always does—turn noise into exhaustion."
"And the girl?"
"She gets options," Cassian says. "Programs. Oversight. Stability."
Nyra closes her eyes. "You're rearranging her life to get to him."

“I’m protecting her from him,” Cassian replies smoothly. “That’s the version that survives review.”
Nyra opens her eyes.
“You want my name on this,” she says.
“Yes,” Cassian answers. “Because you still believe in process.”
Nyra laughs quietly. “You don’t know me very well anymore.”
Cassian pauses. Just a fraction too long.
“I know you don’t like this,” he says. “But I also know you understand stakes.”
“I understand costs,” Nyra says. “And who ends up paying them.”
“That’s leadership,” Cassian replies. “Making peace with that.”
The call ends.
Nyra sits there, staring at the dark screen.
She thinks of Miles—stubborn, infuriating, incapable of letting go once he knows where the line is.
She thinks of Evie—too smart, too young, already being shaped by hands she can’t see.
And she thinks of Lena Corwin, whose name never appears in any of the documentation Nyra is looking at now.
Closed.
Nyra makes her decision.
She doesn’t delete the containment order.
She edits it.
Just enough.
She reroutes one approval. Delays another. Introduces a compliance check that will take hours to resolve—maybe a day if someone asks the wrong question.
It isn’t sabotage.
It’s friction.
Nyra sends one message. Off-network. Unlogged.

You’re running out of quiet.
They’re choosing the kid.
If you’re going to move, do it now.
She powers down the terminal and stands.
This is the part no one writes reports about.
Nyra Jones doesn’t stop the system.
She just leans on it hard enough that it can’t close as cleanly as it wants to.
And when the reckoning comes—because it always does—
she wants there to be witnesses still standing.
Nyra picks up her coat and walks out of the office without looking back.
Containment works best when everyone agrees.
Tonight, one person doesn’t.

16

What Lena Proved

Miles waits until Evie is asleep.

Not because he thinks she'll stop him—she won't—but because there are moments that shouldn't have witnesses, especially not the kind that change you. Evie curls on the far end of the couch, hoodie pulled over her head, laptop closed for once. Her breathing is even. Trusting.

That trust is a liability.

Miles moves quietly, the way you do when you've spent a lifetime learning how not to be noticed. He takes the drive from his pocket and sits at the folding table alone, the annex lights dimmed low enough to feel like a confession.

This is the last fragment.

He knows it the way you know when a room has only one exit left.

The file opens without ceremony. No warning banners. No encryption left to fight. Lena didn't want this part protected—she wanted it understood.

The screen fills with text.

Not notes.

Logic.

Lena didn't build an argument. She built a proof.

Miles reads slowly. Not because it's dense, but because it's devastatingly simple.

She mapped escalation pathways across departments. Not actions—responses. Who defers to whom. How long decisions take to travel upward. Where they stall. Where they vanish.

Then she overlaid outcomes.
Deaths. Firings. “Resignations.” Closed cases. Reassignments.
The pattern isn’t corruption.
It’s inevitability.
Once silence becomes the preferred response, the system can’t correct itself—not without tearing out its own spine.
Every layer above depends on the one below pretending not to see.
Lena didn’t prove someone was guilty.
She proved no one had to be.
Miles scrolls to the final section.
A short paragraph. Unadorned. Almost gentle.
If this is correct, exposure won’t matter.
Evidence won’t matter.
Accountability will be absorbed, redistributed, and neutralized.
The only thing that creates change is disruption—not truth.
Truth is what gets you killed.
Disruption is what keeps you alive long enough to matter.
Miles leans back in his chair.
He understands now.
Lena wasn’t trying to bring anything down.
She was trying to prove where the floor gives way.
So someone else could choose where to stand.
A sound behind him.
He turns.
Evie stands in the doorway, barefoot, eyes sharp despite the sleep still clinging to her.
“You’re doing the thing,” she says quietly.

“I waited,” Miles replies.
“You always do,” she says. “You just never stop.”
She steps closer, looks at the screen. He doesn’t try to block it anymore.
“She knew,” Evie says.
“Yes,” Miles replies. “And she kept going anyway.”
Evie swallows. “That’s not bravery. That’s… math.”
Miles nods. “Exactly.”
She looks up at him. “So what does that make us?”
He closes the file.
“Standing in the same place,” he says.
Evie’s jaw tightens. “Then don’t finish it.”
Miles meets her eyes. “Someone has to.”
“No,” Evie says firmly. “Someone has to survive.”
Silence stretches between them. Not hostile. Final.
Miles looks down at the drive in his hand. At Lena’s last gift.
“This is why she died,” he says. “Not because she found something. Because she proved it couldn’t be fixed from the inside.”
Evie nods once. “Which means—”
“—which means if we keep going the same way,” Miles finishes, “we end up like her.”
Evie takes the drive from his hand.
Just takes it.
“You don’t get to be the martyr,” she says. “That role’s filled.”
Miles doesn’t stop her.
“What are you doing?” he asks.
“Changing the terms,” Evie replies. “You make noise. I hold truth.”
“That’s dangerous.”
She smiles thinly. “So is copying her footsteps.”
Miles watches her slip the drive into her bag.

For the first time since the funeral, something in his chest loosens—not relief, but clarity.
Lena didn’t need him to finish her work.
She needed him to choose differently.
Outside, somewhere in the building, a door closes. A system adjusting its weight.
Miles exhales.
“Alright,” he says. “Then we do it your way.”
Evie looks up. “You sure?”
He nods. “I’ll be the disruption.”
She meets his gaze, steady. “And I’ll be the reason it survives.”
They don’t shake on it.
They don’t say her name.
They don’t need to.
Because now they both understand the rule Lena died proving:
If you tell the truth head-on, you disappear.
If you bend the system until it limps, it remembers you.
And Miles Long is done walking quietly.

17
The Choice

The offer comes the way Cassian likes his leverage—clean, reasonable, and already half-accepted by the time it's spoken.

Nyra hears about it before Miles does.

That's not an accident.

She's standing in a quiet corridor near Records when her phone vibrates. No caller ID. She doesn't answer it.

Cassian doesn't mind.

"You're running out of room," he says when she finally picks up.

"You built the walls," Nyra replies.

"And you keep leaning on them," Cassian says. "Which is why I'm calling."

Nyra stops walking.

"This ends today," Cassian continues. "One way or another. I'd prefer the version that doesn't echo."

"You always do."

Cassian doesn't deny it.

"Miles Long can disappear again," he says. "Cleanly. No pressure. No follow-ups. We stop touching the girl. Her life snaps back into place. Schools. Programs. Normal."

Nyra closes her eyes.

"And if he doesn't?"

Cassian exhales. Not impatient—resolved.

"Then he becomes the disruption he thinks he wants to be," Cassian says. "And disruptions get contained."

Nyra hears the word for what it really is.
“Say it,” she says.
Cassian pauses.
“Neutralized.”
The call ends.
Nyra doesn’t stand there long. Standing still is how you get folded into someone else’s plan.
She moves.

Miles is on the roof when Nyra finds him.
The city spreads out below like a machine pretending to be alive. Traffic arteries. Light clusters. Motion without intention.
He leans against the railing, jacket open, eyes scanning patterns that only matter to people who’ve lived inside them.
“You’re loud,” Nyra says as she approaches.
“Good,” Miles replies. “That’s the point.”
She steps beside him. Hands in her pockets. Professional to the end.
“They made an offer,” she says.
Miles doesn’t look at her. “Of course they did.”
“They leave Evie alone,” Nyra continues. “She gets her life back.”
Miles’ jaw tightens.
“And me?”
“You go away,” Nyra says. “Again. But for real this time.”
Miles finally turns to her.
“Not dead,” he says.
“No,” Nyra replies. “Just… irrelevant.”
They stand in silence, the city humming like it’s eavesdropping.
“You know what this is,” Nyra adds. “They’re choosing her.”
Miles nods slowly. “I figured.”

“If you keep pushing,” she says, “they’ll escalate around her. Not violently. Administratively. She’ll never be free of it.”
Miles grips the railing. Metal bites into his palms.
“And if I take the deal?”
“She’s clean,” Nyra says. “You’re gone. And Lena stays buried.”
That name lands between them like a dropped glass.
Miles laughs quietly. “They really think that’s a choice.”
Nyra turns to him. “It is.”
He looks at her. Really looks. The agent. The friend. The last honest mirror left standing.
“You ever notice,” Miles says, “how every ‘reasonable’ solution asks the same person to disappear?”
Nyra doesn’t answer.
“You already chose,” he continues. “You just don’t want to say it.”
Nyra swallows. “I chose the kid.”
Miles nods. “You should.”
She studies him. “Don’t do this like it’s noble.”
“I’m not,” he replies. “I’m doing it because I’m done negotiating my silence.”
Nyra exhales sharply. “They’ll come for you.”
Miles smiles. It’s not brave. It’s certain.
“I know,” he says. “That’s how I know it’s working.”

Evie knows before he tells her.
She’s sitting cross-legged on the floor, back against the wall, laptop open but idle. She looks up when Miles enters, eyes sharp.
“They made you an offer,” she says.
“Yeah.”
“You said no.”

“Yeah.”
She closes the laptop slowly. “You’re an idiot.”
Miles shrugs. “I’ve been called worse.”
“They were going to let me go,” Evie says. “You could’ve taken it.”
Miles crouches in front of her. Keeps his voice level.
“They were going to own the fact that they let you go,” he says. “That’s not freedom. That’s a leash they don’t have to pull anymore.”
Evie’s throat tightens. “So instead you become the target.”
“Yes.”
She looks away. Then back.
“And if they kill you?”
Miles doesn’t dodge it. “Then you finish it.”
She stares at him. “You don’t get to decide that.”
“No,” he says gently. “But I get to decide who I am when it counts.”
Silence stretches. Long. Real.
Evie finally nods. Once.
“Okay,” she says. “Then we do it right.”
Miles raises an eyebrow. “We?”
She smirks. “You said you’d be the disruption.”
She taps her bag. “Someone still has to remember why.”
Miles exhales. Half laugh. Half surrender.
“Lena would’ve liked you,” he says.
Evie meets his eyes. “She already did.”
Outside, the city keeps moving, unaware that a line has just been crossed.
Miles Long has refused to disappear.
And somewhere in a glass office, Cassian Trude feels the shift —not panic, not fear—

Just the quiet certainty that the problem has decided to stay alive.

FINAL CHAPTER

Fault Line

Miles doesn’t release anything.
That’s what confuses them most.
No leak.
No press call.
No manifesto dressed up as righteousness.
Just… movement.
Small things at first. A meeting that doesn’t happen because the right person isn’t there. A committee delayed because someone called in sick at exactly the wrong time. A contractor quietly refusing an extension they would’ve signed yesterday.
The machine hiccups.
Cassian notices the pattern before anyone else does. He always does. It’s not chaos—chaos would be easier. This is selective friction. Someone is touching the system in places it assumes are numb.
Miles doesn’t shout truth.
He introduces inconvenience.
A procurement review here.
A compliance audit there.
Nothing illegal. Nothing dramatic. Just enough pressure in enough joints that the structure starts compensating.
And compensation creates visibility.
Evie watches it unfold from a distance she chose carefully. She doesn’t publish Lena’s work. Not yet. She breaks it apart—harmless-looking fragments scattered across time and location. Academic inquiries. Budget anomalies. Questions that sound boring enough to survive scrutiny.

Truth becomes background radiation.
Impossible to point at. Impossible to eliminate.
Nyra reads the internal memos piling up on her desk and understands what Miles has done.
He didn't bring a bomb.
He brought erosion.

Cassian calls him once.
Just once.
"You're burning credibility," Cassian says. "That used to matter to you."
Miles stands on a pedestrian bridge overlooking traffic, watching headlights smear into continuous motion.
"Credibility only matters," he replies, "when the system agrees on what's real."
Cassian exhales. "You're not going to win."
Miles smiles faintly. "I'm not trying to."
Silence stretches.
"What do you want?" Cassian asks.
Miles looks out over the city.
"I want you to keep noticing me," he says. "That's all."
The line goes dead.
Cassian doesn't call again.

The fallout isn't dramatic.
No arrests.
No hearings.
No public reckoning.
Just… damage.

Two senior staff quietly resign within a month. A task force gets dissolved “pending restructuring.” A sealed case is reopened under a different name by people who don’t know why they’re uneasy—only that something doesn’t sit right anymore.
The system survives.
It always does.
But it doesn’t forget.
And it doesn’t heal cleanly.
Evie packs up her laptop one night and looks at Miles across the room.
“They’ll come back for you,” she says.
“I know,” he replies.
“When?”
He shrugs. “When I stop being useful.”
She nods. “Or when I stop being annoying.”
Miles chuckles. “That too.”
She hesitates. “You okay with this?”
He thinks of Lena.
Of the question he never answered.
Of the proof that didn’t save her—but changed the math.
“No,” he says honestly. “But I’m okay with who I am now.”
Evie smiles faintly. “Good.”
She slings her bag over her shoulder.
“Because I’m not done,” she adds.
Miles watches her go, something like pride tightening in his chest.

Somewhere else, in a glass office with a perfect view, Cassian Trude reviews a report he doesn’t remember requesting.
It’s nothing alarming.
That’s the problem.

He sets it down slowly.
For the first time in years, Cassian feels something unfamiliar stir beneath his composure.
Not fear.
Uncertainty.
The fault line is there now.
Invisible. Irreversible.
And Cassian knows—because men like him always know—
The ground doesn't have to collapse to be dangerous.
It just has to shift enough that everyone starts feeling it.
Miles Long disappears into the city, not as a fugitive, not as a hero—
But as a man who has learned exactly where to stand.
And somewhere in the system's bones, something creaks.
Not breaking.
Not yet.
But no longer whole.

END

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Kamary Phillips is a writer, producer, and storyteller whose work spans fiction, audio, and screen-based narratives. His writing often explores power, loyalty, identity, and the moral fractures that emerge inside institutions meant to protect.

He is the founder of Audible Publishers, an independent imprint dedicated to original, creator-owned stories designed for cross-media adaptation. USSS: The Fault Line is part of an ongoing narrative universe developed under the USSS: Secret Service banner.
Phillips lives and works between Baltimore and the Carolina coast.